The deed at this time refers to a brick dwelling house, which was located north of the present one, probably the present 320 Henry Ave. Schueler was a farmer and ran a saloon in Manchester called the Manchester Saenger Hall. It was located on Lot 10, Block 6 of Bartold's Addition. He died in 1912, having already sold his property. The styleless character of this house makes dating of it difficult, but it was presumably built by Schueler to supplement the brick house to the north.

ran a jewelry store at 722 Manchester Road. When he died in June, 1909, the property was described as a "6-room, 2-story frame dwelling with store building and ware house attached, occupied by Arthur Kleinsorge." Kleinsorge had married Munsch's daughter Ida the previous October. He was manager of the Postal Telegraph Company in Manchester (presumably Gregg's position before him) and served as justice of the peace.

In 1852, and when Bartold platted his Western Addition to Manchester in 1855, this building was shown on the plat. The story that the building was an early school is not substantiated by documentary evidence, but the lot did have a blacksmith's shop and a wagonmaker's shop on it, which Bartold leased to John Bauman and Joseph Killigen in 1855 for five years. Bartold sold the property in 1855 to Joseph Schreiner and George Reichard and in 1857 to George Wisker. He himself lived on the north side of Manchester Road, directly opposite. He died in 1858. In 1864, the property was sold by Joanna Couch to George Kropp, who was a blacksmith and wagonmaker. Kropp died in 1879.

plain capitals. The opening between the posts is arched by a wood panel that also has circular cutouts. The balcony above this entry porch is supported by Tuscan columns situated on a platform. Between the columns are fan-shaped tracteries with triangular motifs between the two street-facing tracteries. The first floor is decorated with a diagonal bay window. The double-hung windows (one-over-one lights) are decorated with Tuscan columns at corners. The window spandrel has been sided in with vertical siding below window openings. Above the windows the cornice is decorated with modillions and square and rectangular panels. The bay window roof projects out. This is decorated with an ornate wood balustrade that outlines bay and extends to the second-story porch. There is a single double-hung window between bay and porch (one over one) with plain moulding with a slight projection. The second-story windows -- two outer windows angled out -- have brackets that have cutout carved shapes. The outer window has one large fixed glass window. The middle window is decorated with plain trim with extra large window head that extends upward to form a dentilled and panelled cornice containing a semi-circular fan light. The gable end has fishscale shingles with decorated verge at gable ridge. Brackets support roof along side elevations. The front porch foundation is enclosed with lattice work.

Monastees, the widow of David Monastees (they were married in 1842), and the mother of Amelia, who married John Straszer in 1871. Straszer built the Lyceum (now Manchester City Hall) in 1894 and organized the Bank of Manchester in 1869. Amelia Straszer inherited the property sometime between 1894 and 1900, and the house was probably built during that period. She died in 1922, leaving the house and the one next to it, which had been her mother's, to her daughter Emily Herzig.

he sold it to William F. Berry, an early settler of Manchester who already had a house and tavern or hotel on the north side of Manchester Road directly opposite. He died in 1868. In 1865 Francis Migneron, a gem-smith, had purchased the corner at Sulphur Springs Road, with a 40-foot frontage on Manchester Road, and he acquired the rest of the site from Berry's estate in 1869 for $400. Presumably his own home was located on the west portion of the property. He sold a small portion of the north-east corner of the property to Mary E. Monastes or Monnastes sometime in the 1870's, and another 40 feet in 1879, and she presumably built the present house the next year. After Migneron died, his heirs sold her the rest of the property in 1894, and her daughter Amelia Straszer presumably tore down Migneron's house to build the present one at #802.

as a tailor and hotel proprietor. He died in 1891, and in 1894 his widow Franziska, a dressmaker, and son J. H. Dietrich sold the property for $3000 to Mary E. Monnastes. She lived in another brick house at 806 Manchester Road. Her daughter Amelia was the wife of John Straszer, the builder of the Lyceum at #920 and of the frame residence at #802. In 1923 Straszer organized the Citizens Bank of Manchester, reorganized as the First National Bank in 1905, with directors Henry Seibel and D. C. Taylor, both of whom are associated with surviving structures in Manchester. At that time Straszer and his wife deeded the house to the bank, which used it as headquarters for several years.

The building was purchased in 1919 by Harvey and Viola Scheuer, who returned it to residential use. They lost it in 1938, when it was purchased by Edward L. Fredericks, a physician.

This building has an enclosed one-story front porch with double-hung windows that fits into the L-shape plan. The street facing gable has fishscale shingles in gable end. All five windows on the front facade are double-hung with plain wood lintels. A chimney is located at ridge line outside wall at ridge.
43. History and Significance
Octavius and Laura McCune bought a tract of 300 acres in 1890 from J. W. Peoples. In 1894, apparently faced with financial difficulties, they sold all but about 60 acres, but in 1897 they lost the remaining tract anyway. In 1901 Henri Chomeau, a Clayton businessman, sold that tract to Herman Hauhart, whose family farmed other land in the area. In 1906, he sold to Martin Engler, who sold five acres in.				411 Sulphur Spring Road, Rt. 2

43. History and Significance The congregation had two homes, built in 1826 and 1837, before this one was built. It was "completely remodeled and restored" in 1959, and in 1969 a new sanctuary was completed, leaving the older building as a chapel. From its pioneer beginnings, the church has become the largest United Methodist church in Missouri.

porch cornice is highlighted with modillions and guilloches. A modern wood balustrated is provided between square-shaped porch columns. The porch is supported by brick piers. The front facade is accentuated with brick pilasters at each corner. The front is further decorated with an oval window (outlined in stone) with stone keystone side and bottom caps. An octagonal cupola with a domed roof is located at the roof ridge at the front gable. The side elevation consists of four triple-hung sash windows. The windows are accentuated with brick radiating voussoirs. A raised basement provides additional windows (irregular shapes) and are also decorated with radiating voussoirs. A modern addition is to the northwest.
