Describe the present and original (if known) physical appearance

The large Italianate house has been altered in two ways. The tall cupola has been truncated and now its original roof sits directly on top of the main roof. A small one story, single bay front porch was razed and a single story porch with fluted Doric columns and paired brackets in the eaves currently extends across the front facade. (See photographs #1 and #2) These two alterations are minor and do not disrupt the architectural integrity of the house which is embellished with a three foot wide eave, with ornate paired brackets. (See photograph #3) These brackets are echoed in the projecting trabeated window lintels. Shutters also accent the two-over-four doublehung second story windows. The first story windows are extremely attenuated and triple hung with two lights in each section. The rear ell is one and one-half story with a gable roof and with bold corner pilasters supporting a window cornice where small half windows are located.

Entering the house through a double leaf entrance flanked by sidelights one finds a 12' by 37' hall which extends through the house at each level. (see photographs #4 and #5) Probably due to the early date for this style in a rural setting, the interior returns to Greek Revival motifs except for the Italianate octagonal newel in this hall. The stair is highlighted by a delicately carved rail, spindle balusters and a bracketed stringer. Four rooms, 17' by 18' each with a fireplace of Greek Revival detailing (see photographs #6, #7 and #8), are on each floor. Built-in cabinets flank the mantle of the northwest, first story room. (See photograph #9) Millwork on the second story is slightly less ornate. Some original random width plank flooring remains. The rear ell has been completely remodeled; a bath has been added and the large cooking fireplace has been closed. The slave quarters above are reached from an exterior stair off the pent porch to the south.

Located in a completely rural setting, the house faces east and sits back from County Road A. Outbuildings are to the west but are insignificant to the residence and are not included in the nomination. The house is in the process of restoration. Most exterior work is complete. The owners hope to elevate the cupola to its original height by using plexiglass and aluminum to eliminate the weight problem. Interior work is in progress and is highlighted by the fact that many pieces of furniture and decor remain intact from the early periods of the house's occupancy.

Specific dates 1859 Builder/Architect John Taylor

Statement of Significance (in one paragraph)

This large Italianate/Greek Revival style house is significant because it was built at an early date for its style in this area, is not only one of the first Italianate structures but one of the finest examples in the area, and by its rural setting, demonstrates the wealth that was distributed throughout the county and the important part it played in agriculture and commerce. The house is important both for its architectural integrity and its historical merit. Another significant feature is the fact that the house is well maintained and is in the process of complete restoration to its original condition.

Historically Prairie View, or Crestmead, is a fine example of a rural antebellum Missouri plantation that was successful in transforming into a large and prosperous stockfarm. In its original place in time, the farm remains the finest example of such a plantation in Cooper County.

Built in 1859 as the residence of John Taylor, the farm operated under slave labor until the close of the Civil War. The next owner, Presley G. Walker, resided here from 1865 until 1883, and under his ownership the "Prairie View" land holdings increased in size to over 2500 acres. As a result of Walker's fine management and insistence upon class and quality, the farm became well-known as the breeding ground of some of Missouri's best registered Shorthorn cattle as well as being a successful grain operation. For twenty years beginning in 1883, the farm languished in a period of successive owners and speculators.

In 1903, the farm was purchased by William A. Betteridge and six years later the name of the residence and grounds was legally changed to "Crestmead." Betteridge soon developed the operation into a model modern farm, also specializing in the breeding of registered Shorthorn cattle. A valuable herd sired by Lavenda Viceroy and Victorious from the herd were sold to stockfarms throughout the United States. In 1938, Crestmead continued its operation under Betteridge's son, Verne, followed in 1980 by a grandson, Robert, who is the present owner.
